The Seed

Herbs or herbalism are different things to different people. Herbs are defined in the Oxford dictionary as plants of which the leaves or stems are used for food, medicine, or in some way for their scent or flavor. In the various branches of medicine, the word usually implies plants that are sources for healing remedies, either in their crude form or as sources of physiologically active chemicals.

Taken in the holistic context in its broadest sense, a herb is a plant in relationship with humanity and Herbalism becomes the study and exploration of the interaction between humanity and the plant kingdom. As interaction can also be defined as communication, one can also say that Herbalism in its true essence understands the language of plants and people and how to establish a harmonious relationship between the two parties. The green world is actively healing the human world.

The Soil

The brisk growth in the alternative health sector is a definite sign of the change in understanding health, our relationship to disease and the earth as a whole. Because of this growth the market place is now flooded with new, often "flash in the pan" products. This makes it difficult to discern which products are quality, reliable and ethical.
